Faculty in the Pratt School of Engineering worked to integrate MATLAB programming activities into a variety of sophomore level courses. The goal of this project was to ensure that skills Engineering students learn during their first year are reinforced later in the curriculum. For example, as part of a new hands-on component in Computational Methods in Engineering, students calibrate a pressure sensor, and then use data from that sensor to control a water pump that feeds a cylinder.